Project Summary

This report outlines the use of social media in museums. The report covers the reasons to use social media in a museum setting, effective social media usage, barriers to the usage of social media sites such as Twitter and Facebook, and tools that can be used to monitor the impact of social media.

From this research as well as the monitoring of the Twitter accounts of 6 Canadian museums, Twitter Tips were created. The Twitter Tips, along with suggestions for the host organization, became The Twitter Guide Book (see appendix 1).

Effective social media relies on the active participation of not only the audience but also the museum. It allows for more visitor participation and interaction at a time when this is becoming an important strategy for museums. Social media is also proven to be a valuable marketing tool, allowing museums to participate directly in conversations about their organization. The biggest draw towards social media is the understanding that the museum can reach an audience well outside its existing community.

The Use of Social Media in Museums

Cultural assets (collections and sites) will continue to be key in our lives but in what form? Can digital heritage really replace the real and if so how? The World Wide Web has already blurred the boundaries between exhibition and publication, and widespread museum digitisation [sic] programmes seem to push museums closer to becoming libraries. Is the distinctive role of museums challenged by this future? Will museums be reconceived, hybridised [sic] or merely altered? –Simon J. Knell¹

Advances in technology have altered the shape of museums^A in the past. But today, with widespread access to the Internet, it has a greater influence than ever before. Social media sites such as Facebook, Flickr, Twitter and Youtube have globally connected millions of users from around the world. But social media is not only for personal use. Businesses have been using this technology to their advantage, marketing their products to the consumers that flock to the web for information. Museums have been slow to join the trend.

Nearly 27% of the world's population uses the Internet.² In Canada this number is about 74.9% of the population, roughly 26 million people.³ It has been estimated that 80% of all Internet users participate in social media.⁴ These numbers represent a large potential audience for museums that choose to embrace the technology. The Canadian Heritage Information Network recently surveyed approximately 400 museums in Canada and found that 44% were using social media.⁵

^AIt should be noted that the term museum, as used here, encompasses a variety of cultural organizations including museums, archives, art galleries and science centres.

With social media becoming so pervasive in society, museums have been working to adapt the new technology for their own uses. Social media was identified as by the New Media Consortium's Horizon Report 2010 as an emerging technology that is likely to have a great impact on the museum environment, particularly in terms of education and interpretation. While the Horizon Report does not address the social networking aspect of social media (it focuses on sites like Flickr and Youtube, where content such as videos and photographs can be created and uploaded), the message is the same. All forms of social media encourages social interaction between the public and the museum. Social media has the ability to change the way in which museums are viewed. With these technologies comes the belief "that an increasingly pervasive 'information society' will fundamentally alter everyday practices, and perhaps change the position of museums in society."⁶ Technology is unlikely to completely replace the physical museum but in order to remain relevant in this digital age, museums must recognize this shift.

Social Media and Challenging Cultural Authority

Traditionally museums have been treated as a temple of knowledge where the curatorial voice is the only voice of reason.⁷ Museums were and often still are considered a place of facts and cultural authority. However, many museums "are now sites in which knowledge, memory, and history are examined, rather than places where cultural authority is asserted."⁸ To this end, social media has been "used to facilitate a participative cultural experience"⁹ and this participation becomes an important part in engaging people with their own histories while distancing the museum from the mythic temple of knowledge and culture. Social media allows for the widespread understanding that the curatorial voice represents only a single interpretation. As Nancy Proctor writes:

Recognizing that it is impossible for any individual to ‘know-it-all’ in the age of the Internet (if it ever was), the curator today can have an even greater impact by becoming a curator of information in the public domain, and an expert communicator and interpreter, stimulating interest and helping audiences navigate to the information sources that satisfy their curiosity.¹⁰

With the use of social media, it is now understood that “many voices are critical to the interpretation of culture.”¹¹

However, while this may be understood in theory, many museums are slow to put the theory to use. The problem with social media becomes a question of authority and authenticity. There is a concern over content that can be found on the Internet and whether that content is accurate. But this is also why social media can be of value to museums. As a perceived cultural authority, any information validated by the museum would be understood as being quality information. Therefore, social media can play a valuable role:

The notion of authenticity as provided by the museum organizes collections of narratives into recognizable and authoritative histories, mediating the relationship between visitors and objects. Social media extends this authenticity by enabling the museum to maintain a cultural dialogue with its audiences in real time.¹²

The curator now can facilitate discussions and has the ability to teach beyond the scope of the museum’s exhibitions.

At the same time, a further concern becomes the validating of contributions made by the public through social media. Museums are put in a position where they need to trust in the knowledge of others and “recognize that expertise does not necessarily entail a curatorial elite.”¹³

There are many amateur experts whose knowledge comes from passion. The curator and the subject expert are not always one and the same. It is no longer relevant for a curator to remain only within his or her interest or speciality. In order to be of interest to the masses, curators must embrace public participation.

As part of the quest to remain socially relevant, “museums need to move from being suppliers of information to providing usable knowledge and tools for visitors to explore their own ideas and reach their own conclusions.”¹⁴ While social media does not make everyone an expert, museums do need to understand the value of public participation.

In the new cultural economy, the curator’s expertise will be judged not just by the depth of his or her subject-knowledge, but also by the extent, diversity, and richness of the network that is engaged in active conversation with the curator, thereby ensuring the ongoing quality, relevance, and future of the discourse.¹⁵

Social media can provide the platform for this discourse.

Social Media and the Participatory Museum

Social media is about engaging and connecting with an audience. “Participation, communication, and audience incentive will need to be considered together if social media are to provide viable and sustainable opportunities for the museum.”¹⁶ As museums delve further into the use of these technologies, participation becomes a key aspect for the effective use of social media. More and more people want to become directly involved in culture through “some type of participative learning experience” and through engaging “with complex and controversial topics.”¹⁷ But participation does not just occur on the part of the audience. It is part of a bigger picture.

People do not participate merely for the fun of it. They care about having their voice heard. Museums need to respond to visitors' participation. It is a success "when visitors understand how their participation will impact not just their experience but the experience of subsequent visitors and staff members."¹⁸ Visitor participation, whether in the gallery or online through social media, is an important part of the museum's quest to remain relevant in society. Tools, such as the participatory aspect of social media, are strategies that allow museums to be as relevant to their audiences as possible.

Reasons to Use Social Media

Encouraging visitor participation is not the only use for social media in a museum setting. Social media provides accessibility and the opportunity to engage with the content even outside the physical barriers of the museum.¹⁹ Digitized collections items can be viewed from home. Sites such as Flickr or Youtube work well to publicize archival content. With many museums undertaking digitization projects it is easy to upload this content onto the Internet. These sites also easily facilitate conversation surrounding the document, making the content and the collection more accessible.

Further, blogs can be used to supplement the content of exhibitions. This can provide visitors with a chance to further their knowledge. Social media, therefore, has the potential to become a learning experience. Another "key feature of social media is that they can tap the collective intelligence of a museum's community to uncover facts and stories that would otherwise be lost."²⁰ This can be particularly valuable on sites such as Flickr where visitors may be able to identify people or places in archival photographs.

Other social media sites, such as Facebook and Twitter, contribute to the overall goal of achieving meaningful dialogue. Museums are beginning to realize that social media is not only a marketing tool but that there is “rich potential to connect with visitors about the ideas that make museums tick.”²¹ The objective of all social media use is to engage with the public while still remaining true to the museum’s overall message.

Social Media as a Marketing Tool

While marketing is not the only use for social media in museums, it is perhaps the most typical approach.²² Social media has value as a marketing tool because it is unique in the sense that there is an opportunity to have meaningful conversations with the audience but it also provides an opportunity to “see the conversations others are having” about the museum.²³ Social media has become an important method of cost effective marketing.

In response to a survey question (see appendix 2), one museum referred to the use of social media as an “outreach tool”:

Social networking had proven to be a very effective outreach tool for our little archives. It is an excellent free alternative to traditional advertisements and allows us to interact freely with patrons, potential patrons, and other institutions. It also keeps [the archivist] in touch with new occurrences in the fields of genealogical research and the archival sciences. In other words, it’s a “win-win” solution to outreach.²⁴

Not only is social media a “win-win” in terms of outreach, but it also strengthens the museum’s presence on the Internet. By linking the museum’s website to the various types of social media used, a synergy wheel is created, where “the combination effect of social media is greater than the sum of their individual effects” (see appendix 3).²⁵ It provides an opportunity for the museum to expand upon the content of the website. This creates an even more powerful marketing tool. Word of mouth can be one of the most simple but effective marketing strategies. With social media, word of mouth can travel further than ever before. But as with any use of the Internet, there is potential for things to go wrong. Using social media as a marketing tool and relying on word of mouth means that some of the content will be user generated. While this is usually positive, there is a possibility that the content will not effectively represent the museum. There is always a chance that misinformation will be posted or that users will discuss a poor experience. Simply because the audience is “marketing on the museum’s behalf”²⁶ does not mean that the museum has no further role to play. While “people share their own photos, videos, and links about and to museums around the world through platforms that are not in the museum’s control,”²⁷ content must still be controlled on the museum’s end.

Why Museums Avoid Social Media

Museums have been criticized for their use of social media and other new technologies, such as mobile applications, because museums are often considered to be spaces where technology has not yet permeated.²⁸ Museums are seen as places of contemplation where there is “the opportunity to disconnect from . . . hyper-connected lives, and the possibility of wonder.”²⁹ For these critics, social media should be avoided simply because it takes away from the contemplative experience.

While museums themselves may not believe that social media use detracts from this experience, there are many practical reasons why social media is not used.³⁰ There may be a lack of staff resources, a lack of funding, or a lack of knowledge. Social media sites are often blocked by the museum's computer network. Further, the board may not be convinced of the value of social media. While some of these challenges can easily be overcome (staff can ask for access to certain sites or take a couple of training courses to increase their understanding), the lack of staff and financial resources provides the largest barrier. At a time when it is typical for a museum to be understaffed and underfunded, it may be difficult to see the value in using social media. There are often other museum operations that are in critical need of attention and take precedence over social media. Even though there are benefits to using social media, these barriers can prevent museums from participating.

Who Are You Reaching?

While it can be difficult to measure the impact of social media, an attempt at monitoring can provide some interesting results (see appendices 4 and 5). Although it can be hard to acquire the data, there are methods which can be used to measure the community response to social media. As one survey response stated:

I use the growth of facebook [sic] "fans" or "likes," flickr [sic] "views" and twitter [sic] "followers" to measure impact to our potential patron base. In terms of impact on the community, I base that on retweets and comments and the amount of requests we receive that state they found us via a certain social network.³¹

Beyond tools available through the sites, such as the Facebook 'like' or the Twitter 'retweet,' there are a few other ways to measure impact. Some museums use interfaces such as Hootsuite, a social media dashboard.³² Hootsuite provides users with the ability to link to their accounts on a variety of social media sites and then track statistics. Hootsuite also allows users to shorten links, track the click-through rate of those links, monitor key words used in conversations, and trace country of origin. Another value of Hootsuite is that it allows for users to pre-tweet. This tool could prove useful for museums where staff time is limited. Using bit.ly to shorten links provides another method for measuring impact. Links that have been posted using bit.ly to shorten the URLs have tracking reports available to gauge how many times a link has been followed.³³

Demographic information is not readily available on Twitter. However, on Facebook, users are able to measure the demographics of those who choose to reveal that information. It is interesting to compare the demographics of onsite attendance to the demographics of the audience engaged through social media. “According to a 2003 report, 7.8 million Canadians (32.3%) visited a museum or art gallery in 1998; of which 32.8% were women and 31.7% were men.”³⁴ A gender analysis was completed for followers of the Twitter accounts of 4 Canadian museums (see appendix 4). On average, 26.1% of the accounts belong to females while 20.4% of the accounts belong to males. A recent article in Muse also measured the gender demographics of more than 9500 Facebook fans of a number of Canadian museums. Those results show that there is a higher percentage of female fans of all age ranges.³⁵

The article also measured Facebook demographics against the age range of onsite visitors. While “attendance at Canadian museums per age demographic [15-29, 30-44, 45-59, 60+] were relatively equal,”³⁶ the majority of the Facebook fans were between the ages 30–44, followed by the 15-29 range. The two older age demographics had a significantly lower percentage of Facebook fans.

There is no easy way to know exactly what impact social media has on museums. It is impossible to accurately tell how many people have been inspired to make a visit to the museum because of social media. One solution that a survey respondent suggested is to have the front desk staff include social media when asking visitors how they found out about the museum.³⁷ It may take a while to build up to the point where people are visiting after seeing the organization mentioned on a social media site. This particular museum had 1 person visit due to Twitter and 4 people visit due to Facebook over a 2 week time period.³⁸

These approaches to monitoring the impact do provide an idea of the museum's online presence. Monitoring impact is also a good way "to determine what content is driving the most interaction."³⁹ This allows for staff understanding of what approach is the most effective for the museum.

Effective Social Media

Social media is most successful when the audience is able to engage and interact with the museum. To do this, the content produced for social media sites must be entertaining. The content should mirror the elements museums try "to design into every program or exhibit."⁴⁰ Social media is an extension of the museum's physical space. Since the museum can be thought of as an experience, effective social media should represent that same feeling.

Beyond that, it is also important for the museum "to maintain a dialogue by responding to comments and engaging in the conversation."⁴¹ It is this combination of content and responsiveness that allows the museum to have a direct and more personal relationship with its audience. Effective social media combines the marketing use with the desire to connect more personally with the audience and encourages the growth of this relationship.

Building these personal connections takes time. Social media, when used well, has the ability to attract users based on common interests. People who may have never been to the museum show their support through their engagement with social media. Museums need to develop strategies for encouraging the audience to be actively vocal in their participation.

Social media spaces, when used to their fullest, are about creating a larger conversation.

But the notion of dialogue, debate, and intellectual capital created online will not flourish in environments where ‘fans’ often choose ‘like this,’ without explaining why.⁴²

The more active participation is encouraged, the more impact the use of social media will have.

Social media is effective when it works for the museum’s purposes. Depending on the museum’s intentions and goals for the use of social media, it is easily adaptable. With many different sites available, museums can choose what is feasible for them. As museums become more comfortable with social media, the elements of challenging the curatorial voice, participation, audience interaction, and marketing can all be used at the will of the museum.

Conclusion

Social media provides a method to challenge some of the misconceptions surrounding museums. It also allows for more visitor participation and interaction at a time when this is becoming an important strategy for museums. Social media is also proven to be a valuable marketing tool, allowing museums to participate directly in conversations about their organization.

The biggest draw towards social media is the understanding that the museum can reach an audience well outside its existing community. As museums work to encourage a younger, more diverse audience, social media can help achieve that goal.

Effective social media relies on the active participation of not only the audience but also the museum. Museums have a responsibility to respond to the audience and provide engaging content through social media. In order for museums to remain an important part of society, they must embrace the fact that they have an inherent social responsibility. If social media is used effectively, it will help museums to remain relevant in a society where technologies have changed the ways of social interaction.

Appendix 1- The Twitter Guide Book

From the research on social media, as well as the monitoring of the Twitter accounts of 6 Canadian museums (see appendix 5), Twitter Tips were created. Some starting ideas for the host organization, should they ever chose to create a Twitter account, were also included. The Twitter Tips, along with suggestions for the host organization, became The Twitter Guide Book.

The Twitter Guide Book was also designed into a shorter booklet. The hope is that other non-profit organizations interested in social media might find these hints useful.

Printing Instructions for The Twitter Guide Book

There are 3 files for The Twitter Guide Book:

- 1) The word document file (The Twitter Guide Book)
- 2) In chronological order (Twitter Chronological)
- 3) In print ready order (Twitter Print Ready)

The word document file is the complete file with the suggestions for the host organization. Files 2 and 3 are the shorter designed version of the Guide Book. They are only available as PDF files.

All files can be printed on 8.5 x 11 sized paper. The chronological file is printed as normal. The print ready file creates the booklet. It will need to be printed double sided and then folded in half.

The Twitter Guide Book: Tips for Creating and Maintaining an Effective Twitter Account

The examples used in this guide book have been taken from the Twitter accounts of 6 Canadian museums. Tips have been suggested based on the monitoring of these accounts as well as additional research into the use of social media.

General Advice

- 1) All Tweets must be 140 characters or less in length.

- 2) Once you have Tweeted something, it is picked up by search engines, so even if you delete the Tweet, it still exists somewhere on the Internet.

- 3) Twitter is most effective when it is used daily.

- 4) Twitter can be used as a marketing tool so you can adapt some of your print marketing strategies for use online.

- 5) You should provide a variety of content to make the account interesting.

Tip 1: Pick a user name that easily identifies your museum.

NS_Archives is Nova Scotia Archives

batashoemuseum is Bata Shoe Museum

RegPlainsMuseum is Regina Plains Museum

Peterborough Museum and Archives (PMA) Suggestions:

PeterboroughMuseum

Tip 2: Write a catchy profile description. Mentioning who is tweeting gives a personal touch. Consider providing a link to your website in your profile description. This helps users to be sure that your account is valid.

Western Canada's largest museum is both a museum and art gallery which means visitors can enjoy world-renowned art and fascinating historical exhibitions. <http://www.glenbow.org>

PMA Suggestions:

It's Mary tweeting from the Peterborough Museum and Archives! There's always something happening on the hill! <http://www.peterboroughmuseumandarchives.ca/index.htm>

Tip 3: You should also link your website to your Twitter account which allows people to find you easily.

Canadian Museum of Civilization website

Tip 4: Tweet about special events that are happening at the museum. However, don't overload people with this kind of information. This is the kind of information they are capable of finding from other sources as well.

Interested in great films? Check out our Muse film series. Tickets go on sale Dec. 12.

Tip 5: Link to your website or other social media sites such as Facebook to provide more details. Since you only have 140 characters per Tweet, you need to be short and concise. Links allow you the opportunity to expand on the basic information. You can shorten links by using bit.ly.

PMA Suggestions:

What local artists would you like to see featured in our new exhibit?

Working on research! Does anybody know where old dairies or cheese factories in the area were located? We want to take before and after photographs.

Tip 7: Run contests through social media. This is a nice way to reward your followers and encourage people to make onsite visits. As a reward you can offer visitors free admission or a small prize pack.

Gateway to the World is a film that shows the impact of #wwII on NS <http://youtu.be/bkbaKvRQ4K4> Filmed throughout war years. (Nova Scotia Archives)

Tip 9: Respond to the public. Take the time to answer questions that people may have or just to socialize with your followers. Taking an interest in them and their experience at the museum helps to build relationships with the public. Even if you only respond to say thank you for retweeting, you are showing that you appreciate your audience.

@WarriorBanker @downtowndawn @annaoverseas @wrlguy @tomflem Thanks for the Rts!

@finefeather Hmm... what a cool idea! Most recent items are government records... but first item... I'll have to do a bit of research :) (Nova Scotia Archives)

Tip 10: Take part in Twitter events such as Follow an Archive Day (@FollowanArchive) or Follow a Museum Day (@followamuseum). These events generate lots of attention so if you take part, you will probably gain some new followers who are interested in your museum. It's also a good way to form connections with other colleagues.

It's #followanarchive day! I'll be recommending some of my favourite archival Twitters throughout the day - starting with @cbc_archives! (Nova Scotia Archives)

Wow! Thanks to organizers & participants. (Nova Scotia Archives)

End of #followanarchive day... Sad. But gained new followers (now over 250!) And contact with colleagues... happy! Great tweeting day :) (Port Hope Archives)

Tip 11: Tweet about general interest items. This shows that the museum is capable of thinking beyond what the collection has to offer. It's also a good way to encourage people to keep up with the local or global cultural news.

Tip 13: Follow other institutions. This is a nice way to show your support for other heritage organizations. This also allows you to enter into conversations with these organizations as well as members of the public.

Welcome to twitter @OshawaMuseum :) (Port Hope Archives)

@NS_Archives Love the youtube channel! It's so ambitious! :) (Port Hope Archives)

PMA Suggestions:

In addition to the 6 museums featured here, some other museums to follow include:

- Art Gallery of Ontario
- Archives of Ontario
- Brooklyn Museum
- CBC Digital Archives
- MoMA
- Robert McLaughlin Gallery
- Nova Scotia Museum
- Vancouver City Archives
- UK National Archives

Other organizations to follow that post relevant museum information include:

- ArchivesNext
- ArchivesOpen
- FollowanArchive
- Followamuseum

Tip 14: Be sure to retweet. You can retweet interesting items that you have seen elsewhere on Twitter and you can also retweet things that have been addressed to you. This way your followers are aware of some of the positive comments that you have received.

Tip 16: Have fun! No matter what you tweet, it is important to be interesting and engaging.

Additional Twitter Comments from Conversation with Questionnaire Respondent

- originally under the digital media department and then moved to marketing about 2 years ago
- tweets once per day - not in your face/overwhelming
- tweets are relevant to communications
- has found that links to images are very very popular
- is able to put the last 5 tweets on the homepage which helps to keep content on website fresh
- to monitor tracks click throughs on links and reviews once a week
- has found that popular links/tweets are arts news announcements and connections to the archival department
- she speaks institutionally - representing the museum - not personally (no names etc.) since the question becomes what happens when that staff member leaves
- the museum has to consider what is within its capacity (staff time is limited)
- says that she knows Twitter is all about the conversation but that's not what works for them in terms of limited staff capacity
- finds that Twitter is driving people to visit the museum
- front desk staff includes social media when asking how people found out about the museum
- took a while to build up to a point where people are actually visiting after seeing it mentioned on social media
- over last two weeks had 1 person visit due to Twitter and 4 due to Facebook
- no response to "contests" such as $5 admission
- says that for arts/culture there are usually 3 points of advertisement before people are inclined to purchase and Twitter/Facebook is one of those three
- keeps people on the radar
- MOMA (San Francisco) is a good example of a museum that uses Twitter well
- yyc hashtag is the hashtag for Calgary (airport code)
- suggests looking at whatthehashtag
- says there is a lot of potential for Youtube
- would like to focus on Facebook next
- highly recommends using Hootsuite
- with Hootsuite she can shorten links, track the click-through, set up pretweets (since she tweets on the weekend even though she's not working), monitor key words (such as name of museum etc.) to see other conversations, see country origin
- no demographic information on Twitter but on Facebook is able to measure demographics of those who choose to reveal that information
- online rights for images is a tough realm
- some images rights you have to pay per viewer (so posting on Facebook would take her whole entire budget)
- often rights for promotional images /artwork for temporary exhibits has to be negotiated

Appendix 2 - Social Media Questionnaire

A short questionnaire was sent to the 6 museums whose Twitter accounts were being monitored as part of this research. Included here is a copy of the questionnaire as well as copies of the answers that were received. Two of the museums declined to participate. All responses have been left anonymous.

Social Media in Museums Questionnaire

1. What types of social media do you use?

Type	Frequency of Use	Purpose of Use	Target Audience	Community Response
Twitter
Facebook
Flickr
Youtube
Blog
Other (please specify)

2. How do you decide what to post?

3. Do you have written policies in place regarding the use of social media?

4. Do you track the impact of social media? If so, how?

5. How do you deal with the copyright/reproduction rights if you post images or links to images, specifically archival documents?

6. What museums or archives do you think use social media well?

7. Further comments.

Social Media in Museums Questionnaire

1. What types of social media do you use?

Type	Frequency of Use	Purpose of Use	Target Audience	Community Response
Twitter	Daily	Outreach & networking	Patrons & other institutions	Difficult to measure
Facebook	Weekly	Outreach, sharing info & event planning	Patrons	Positive
Flickr	Monthly	Outreach for photo collection	General public & Patrons	Positive
Youtube	N/A
Blog	N/A
Other (please specify)	Proposed wiki (awaiting board approval)

2. How do you decide what to post?

Only the archivist is responsible for posting to any and all social networks after they've been board approved. I post based on what's relevant to people and organizations in our geographic area, i.e. historical and events, etc. Also, general historical information from Canadian history; and links that are of interest regarding genealogical and archival studies.

3. Do you have written policies in place regarding the use of social media?

Not yet.

4. Do you track the impact of social media? If so, how?

I use the growth in facebook “fans” or “likes,” flickr “views” and twitter “followers” to measure impact to our potential patron base. In terms of impact on the community, I base that on retweets and comments and the amount of requests we receive that state they found us via a certain social network.

5. How do you deal with the copyright/reproduction rights if you post images or links to images, specifically archival documents?

I only post images and documents that are either in the public domain according to current legislation, or that fall under the archives and libraries exemption category of the copyright act (meaning we own the copyright).

6. What museums or archives do you think use social media well?

- Nova Scotia Archives
- CBC Archives
- Robert McLaughlin Gallery (Oshawa)
- Archives of Ontario
- Bata Shoe Museum (Toronto)

7. Further comments.

Social networking has proven to be a very effective outreach tool for our little archives. It is an excellent free alternative to traditional advertisements and allows us to interact freely with patrons, potential patrons, and other institutions. It also keeps me (the archivist) in touch with new occurrences in the fields of genealogical research and the archival sciences. In other words, it’s a “win-win” solution to outreach.

Social Media in Museums Questionnaire

1. What types of social media do you use?

Type	Frequency of Use	Purpose of Use	Target Audience	Community Response
Twitter	Daily	Communications	Followers and followers of #yyc hashtag
Facebook	Weekly	Ads, Communications, Programming	Fans & Calgary users
Flickr	Monthly	Event photos	Followers
Youtube	Monthly	Programming	Followers
Blog	No
Other (please specify)

2. How do you decide what to post?

Twitter: Tweeting is determined within the scope of our communications plan for the exhibitions. All tweets are coming from the communications department and are consistent with the timing of other communications and marketing schedules.

Facebook: Events are created by our programming team to promote programs. Ads are created for exhibitions to raise awareness for the exhibitions.

Youtube: We post videos that as associated with programming.

Flickr: We post photos of museum events.

3. Do you have written policies in place regarding the use of social media?

No.

4. Do you track the impact of social media? If so, how?

Yes.

Twitter: Hootsuite

Facebook: Facebook

5. How do you deal with the copyright/reproduction rights if you post images or links to images, specifically archival documents?

Facebook: Our Digitization, Publishing & Rights Coordinator approves all online uses for images online. We strictly follow all regulations regarding copyrights. We usually properly credit images we do have online approval for in the comment section of the photo.

6. What museums or archives do you think use social media well?

There a lot of leaders in each of the different applications in North America. A few would be the Brooklyn Museum (all) & the National Gallery (facebook) & Vancouver Art Gallery (facebook).

7. Further comments.

Social Media in Museums Questionnaire

1. What types of social media do you use?

Type	Frequency of Use	Purpose of Use	Target Audience	Community Response
Twitter	Daily	Outreach, education, community-building	High school and up. Average Twitter user in NS is 41.	Excellent.
Facebook	Daily.	Outreach, education	High school and up. Average Facebook user in NS is in their 50s.	Very good.
Flickr	N/A	N/A	N/A	N/A
Youtube	As needed. Checked weekly.	Home to our archival film digitization project.	Students, filmmakers, new media users, educators.	Very good.
Blog	I try to update the blogs I maintain at least once per month.	Outreach, demonstrates use of collections in telling the story of a neighbourhoods and communities	NovaScotia.com is geared more at travellers and tourists. SpacingAtlantic is more popular with students and those interested in urban development.	Good.
Other (please specify)
Historypin	Monthly	Google Map mash-up shows how older photos can be compared to current-day NS	New media users, other archives and museums	OK.

2. How do you decide what to post?

I sometimes follow a “this day in history” model. I often try and tie archival material with current-day events. Sometimes I post things just for fun.

3. Do you have written policies in place regarding the use of social media?

We follow the Government of Nova Scotia’s social media policy.

4. Do you track the impact of social media? If so, how?

I track statistics through Hootsuite and our site’s webstats. I also use Klout and Google Alerts to get more results.

5. How do you deal with the copyright/reproduction rights if you post images or links to images, specifically archival documents?

All of the images and documents we have online are in the public domain.

6. What museums or archives do you think use social media well?

The Nova Scotian museum network, the Vancouver City Archives, @FollowanArchive, CBC Archives, UK National Archives

7. Further comments.

I would also keep an eye on ArchivesNext / ArchivesOpen / and FollowanArchive as they post news often re: archives/museums/private collections using social media.

Social Media in Museums Questionnaire

1. What types of social media do you use?

Type	Frequency of Use	Purpose of Use	Target Audience	Community Response
Twitter	Daily	Sharing news + promoting exhibitions, events, activities + networking	Museum enthusiasts, Travel trade, local audience	Positive
Facebook	Daily	Sharing news + behind the scenes + promoting exhibitions, events, activities + networking	Museum enthusiasts, History lovers, Travel trade, local audience	Positive
Flickr	Daily	Adding Museum photos + networking	Museum enthusiasts, Travel trade, architecture enthusiasts, local audience	Positive
YouTube	Daily	Adding Museum videos + networking	Museum enthusiasts, History lovers, Travel trade	Positive
Blog	Sporadic // Based on project	Documenting special projects	Archeology fans	Positive
Other (please specify)	Tumblr	Behind the scenes	History lovers	TBD

2. How do you decide what to post?

We have a social media strategy that is deployed into various tactics namely:

- Post text content supported with audiovisuals that will lead to interaction on the page:

- Broadcast Museum news (timely messages about the Museum happenings pulled and adapted mostly from press releases) supported by official or non-official Museum audiovisual material
- Broadcast content (including blog posts) that are related to Canadian social and military history
- Two-way conversation
 - Have one on one conversations with guests
 - Respond/acknowledge everything i.e. answer questions, comment on a shared photos or just thank for compliments.
 - Discussions
- Post photo and video content

3. Do you have written policies in place regarding the use of social media?

This is a work in progress. We have a high-level social media policy and guidelines but this has not yet been implemented.

4. Do you track the impact of social media? If so, how?

We produce both qualitative and quantitative analyses. We produce a monthly report using Insights collected by every social media outlet we have. We haven't gone as far as measuring ROI but are planning on it in the near future.

5. How do you deal with the copyright/reproduction rights if you post images or links to images, specifically archival documents?

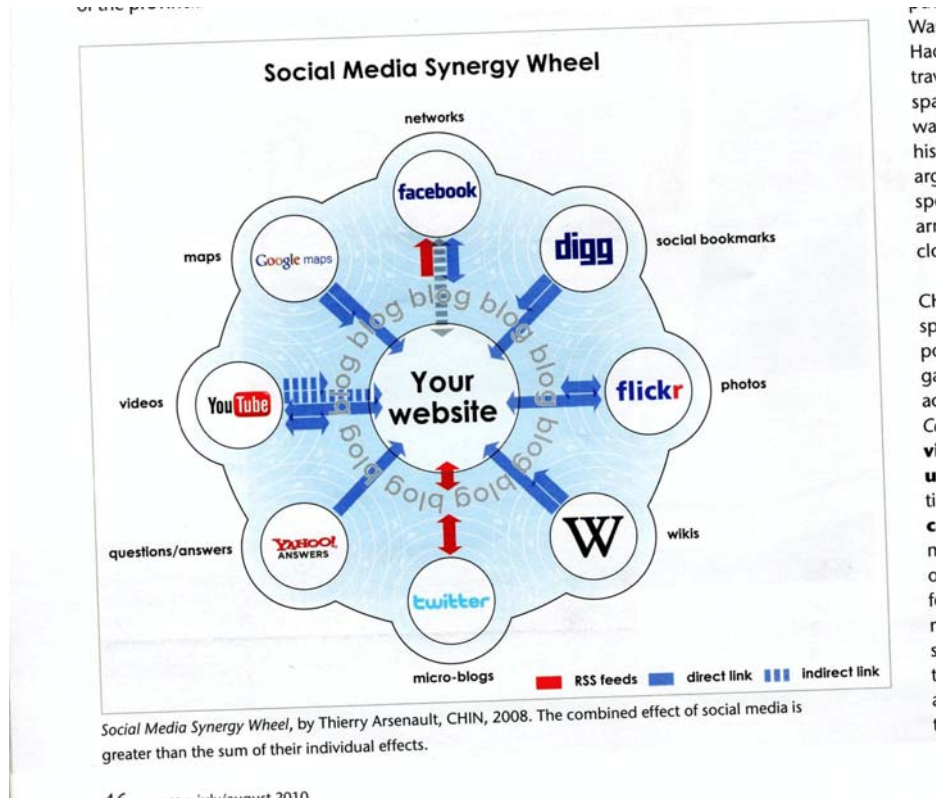

We receive direction from our Archive department.

6. What museums or archives do you think use social media well?

MOMA

Appendix 4 - Gender Analysis

A gender analysis was completed based on the followers of 4 of the Twitter accounts that were monitored during October and November (see appendix 5). Due to the large number of followers of the accounts of Nova Scotia Archives and the Glenbow Museum, it was not feasible to complete a gender analysis for those accounts. However the results would likely be similar.

The gender analysis is based on 4 categories - female, male, corporation and unknown. The unknown category includes accounts where gender could not be determined, the “fun” accounts (eg. the account of Prime Minister Wilfred Laurier) and profiles written in a language other than English or French.

Appendix 5 - Twitter Monitoring

Throughout the months of October and November 2010, the Twitter accounts of 6 Canadian museums were monitored. These Twitter accounts were chosen in order to represent museums and archives across Canada. Three larger organizations were selected along with 3 smaller ones. The results, which have been included here, were used primarily to gain a better understanding of Twitter and its impact. Some of the monitoring results were also used as examples in the Twitter Guide Book.
